Learner Language and Language Learning. C. FAERCH, K. HAASTRUP and R. PHILLIPSON. Methods in Dialectology. This book and the accompanying volume provide an initial impetus for understanding the range of phenomena to be considered and, consequently, for reformulating models of variation. Two basic connections between these two fields of inquiry form the framework for these two books: variation external to the learner and variation internal to the learner. The first provides the basis for this volume; the second the basis for Volume II. Kasper begins her chapter with a review of interlanguage pragmatics, clarifying basic notions and discussing several central theoretical issues, including that of contextual variation.
