The buildings in the part of the city are much moderner than in its centre. Life in the country is more expensive than city life. The town is famous for its library, one of the oldest in the country. The book contains lots of illustrations including maps, engravings of citizens and celebrities. DeJean comments on them and ties them in to her narrative. I bought this as a sourcebook. With a common sense reminiscent of Jane Jacob's and like her without a training in urban planning, Ms, Dejean provides insights that perhaps only a newcomer to Paris could generate and proves more perceptive in many ways than the French themselves. The book is well illustrated, with black and white plates integrated with the main text and coloured ones sadly grouped separately in the middle of the book.
