To ancient Egyptians, death was not the end, but rather the beginning of a new existence and a transition to another reality. According to ancient Egyptian afterlife beliefs, after a person died he or she would be judged by Osiris, the god of the afterlife, the underworld, and the dead. The fragment of the Book of Two Ways was found on the coffin of a lady called Ankh from Dayr al-Barsha. The Dayr al-Barsha project started in 2012, but it's first now that archaeologists noticed this valuable ancient Egyptian text that contains spells and instructions on how to proceed to the Underworld. Despite the importance of Maat, ancient Egypt's most important religious concept, male gods were considered to be responsible for the creation and regeneration.
