Chicago embodied the triumph of American industrialization. Its meatpacking industry typified the sweeping changes occurring in American life. The last decades of the nineteenth century, a new era for big business, saw the formation of large corporations, run by trained bureaucrats and salaried managers, doing national and international business. Chicago, for instance, became America's butcher. The Chicago meat processing industry, a cartel of five firms, produced four fifths of the meat bought by American consumers. Kipling described in intimate detail the Union Stock Yards, the nation's largest. The coal industry was a major foundation for American industrialization in the nineteenth century. As a fuel source, coal provided a cheap and efficient source of power for steam engines, furnaces, and forges across the United States. As an economic pursuit, coal spurred technological innovations in mine technology, energy consumption, and transportation. Cheap coal undoubtedly helped America's rapidly industrializing economy, but it also created an industry structure characterized by boom and bust periods, low profit margins, and cutthroat competition among firms. But however it was raised, the United States became more and more dependent upon coal as the nineteenth century progressed, as demonstrated by Figure 2. Historical Surveys like "Industrializing America: The Nineteenth Century" often exhibit a tendency to prize brevity over depth, as if one would "swim" in the ocean by wading into the water up to one's knees, eschewing the dangerous breakers on the horizon. However, Walter Licht's excellent, resource-rich overview of the role industry played in the history of the United States avoids this stunting effect by providing deep "dives" into the details of the time period in question. This has the much Historical Surveys like "Industrializing America: The N...
