The structure of Latin is about as far from English as the structure of Japanese. However, some bogus rules which continue to plague English students stem from overly enthusiastic Latin scholars who tried hard to force English grammar to conform to Latin rules. One of these is "Infinitives must not be split" (they can't be split in Latin, as the infinitive is a single word; the English infinitive is two words), and another is "Sentences must not end with prepositions" (because pre position in Latin literally means "standing before," so a preposition, they say, "can't stand alone at the end of..."). While English has borrowed much vocabulary from Latin, its grammar remains distinctively, well, English. This is not to say that the English grammar hasn't been subject to external influences. Latin is a heavily inflected language with largely free word order. Nouns are inflected for number and case; pronouns and adjectives (including participles) are inflected for number, case, and gender; and verbs are inflected for person, number, tense, aspect, voice, and mood. The inflections are often changes in the ending of a word, but can be more complicated, especially with verbs. The Study Guide for Those Learning Latin. ISBN: 0934034346. ISBN-13: 9780934034340. In English, a noun's role in a sentence is determined by its position in that sentence, and/or by any prepositions immediately before it. For example, the subject of a sentence (the person performing the action) usually goes at the start of the sentence, while the object (the person to whom the action is done) goes at the end: The boy [subject] loves the girl [object]. In Latin, a noun's role is determined by its case.
