Relationship maintenance behaviors Relational maintenance behaviors serve to sustain or improve the relationship (Dindia & Emmers-Sommer, 2006). Two maintenance frameworks are relevant to attachment, LDRs, and perceived stress. In contrast, the secure are high on effective self-disclosure and have high regard for the partner. Therefore, the secure may use higher levels of assurances and positivity than the avoidant and anxious. If the anxious use assurances as a way to keep the partner proximal, they may use more assurances than avoidant individuals. For RCCUs, the avoidantly attached suppress attachment information and thoughts of the partner, and may, therefore, use relatively few RCCUs. and repairs, developing maintenance standard, and organizing the shop for maximum efficiency.
